According to a recent poll, 80% of Americans say it’s important that the United States works to improve health globally. Why? 62% say it can protect Americans’ health; 61% say wealthy nations have a responsibility to help developing nations; and half say that improving health in other countries will help protect our economic security.

Congressional support is crucial to America’s leadership in this area.

It is critical that we in the global health community receive the resources we need to save lives and offer hope to the millions of children who suffer from malaria, dengue fever, HIV/AIDS and other devastating diseases.
