

Megan Jones has been with Sepsis Alliance since 2021, and now serves as Director of Community Education and Support. In her role, she created and leads the Sepsis Alliance Connect virtual support community which is now approaching 9,000 members. She was project lead for the PCORI-funded community engagement award, “Saving Time to Save Lives: Building a Research-Ready Community for Sepsis Diagnosis” and now regularly facilitates focus groups, patient advisory boards, and surveys to incorporate the perspectives of those with personal experiences of sepsis into research and innovation.

Prior to Sepsis Alliance, she worked with the Community Building Initiative in Charlotte, NC and several other nonprofits in the areas of program management, development, and communication. She received her Bachelors of Arts degree from George Mason University in Fairfax, VA and now resides in San Diego, CA.
